The Screaming of the Rafida is as Much as Their Pain

Those who follow the news of the Rafida in Iraq and witness the miserable situation that overwhelms them, with every hit they receive from the soldiers of the Islamic State and, at the same time, the celebration they spread upon achieving any alleged victory, no matter how small, will be well aware of the extent of the weakness and fear they feel. They fear that the next hit of the mujahidin may break their backs, so they try to show strength and control to cover the humiliation and defeat they are living in reality.

Every time a detachment of the mujahidin that area spread in Iraq succeeds in delivering a blow to their forces, we get surprised by the intensity of their screams and the severity of their exaggerated lamentations. Because the weakness they are in makes them feel pain multiplied by what other kuffar and murtaddin fighting the Islamic State might feel, despite the fact that those others might have suffered more sometimes.

And every time they come up with alleged news, stating that they were able to kill large numbers of the mujahidin, thwart large plans by the mujahidin, or target their leaders and emirs. We are also surprised by the size of the celebrations they hold for these allegations. The reason being is that they try to cover up the psychological defeat they feel, and fear that it will soon lead to a military defeat in the field, with news of victories, conquests, and empowerment.

This is how the defeated weak party is happy for any news of victory, no matter how small, and blows into it until it becomes as big as his defeat and his own brokenness, hoping that he will coverup the bad news and prevent people from seeing it.

Today, it is not hidden from anyone that the reasons for the weakness of the Rafida in Iraq are many and dangerous. Their exhausting war against the Khilafah soldiers is not the only one in it, although it is one of the most common factors to reveal that weakness, and what strengthens the impact of the rest of the reasons weakening the Rafida government and its militias.

The Rafida government is aware of the reality of its wrecked army, which has been completely crushed in the war against the Islamic State over the past years, and has become more like poor-performing militias with little armament than the strong regular armies. This government also realizes that it has become like an exhausted patient whose every move increases his exhaustion and reinforces his weakness. At the same time, there is no hope for renewing this army and strengthening its power, in light of the state of bankruptcy that may push the Rafida government even to cut or reduce the salaries of soldiers, which will constitute a real disaster for this murtadd army and its leadership, by Allah's permission.

It is also well aware of its poor economic and financial situation, in light of the debts that it accumulated during the war with the Islamic State. It was unable to pay any part of that debt, rather, it increased it many times over, to cover the expenses of this war, and to ensure the continuity of the government's work, even in a formal way. This was especially emphasized in light of its oil resources decline, and militia pressure increases on it to secure greater gains for the parties, and to secure more jobs and services for the people living under its rule.

For all that, they are greatly afraid of their inability in the coming period to finance the war against the Islamic State, or that Allah will enable conquest of the lands by the hands of the Khilafah soldiers again, so that they will not find anything to use for their war once more.

Likewise, the political situation of the Rafida of Iraq, today, is not at its best. The conflict between parties and militias is on the rise. It is almost close to the threshold of clash and confrontation, and is getting out of the control of the hands of Iran's intelligence services and its Revolutionary Guards.

Likewise, the fever of demonstrations and protests has not been lifted for nearly a year, constantly pressuring the nerves of the Rafida government and its parties, threatening a dangerous fire in the central and southern regions, which will not be easy for them to quell.

And on top of all that, the date of the elections, to which all eyes turn, is getting closer. This will proximate the dates of postponed clashes between them, by Allah's permission.

These matters and other things that the Rafida government in Iraq and its militias are aware of more than others, reveal to them the weakness of their strength and the lack of their plot, in contrast to the strength and empowerment they show to people.

Hence, they severely feel the pain of every hit they receive from the mujahidin. They suffer more because of their weakness than they feel the pain of the strikes. And they suffer more because of their inability to prevent attacks than from those attacks. We ask Allah to increase their weaknesses and misfortunes, strengthen us over them, and enable us over them, for victory is only from Allah, the Mighty and the Compassionate, and all praise is due to Allah, the Lord of all creation.
